A hundred years ago, in the countryside of North Yorkshire, there lived a Princess called Godel. One golden morning Godel was digging up some bright flowers from her garden, to give to the God Terra. Suddenly, she found a Viking chest full to the brim with Gold. The chest belonged to the evil God Mars, who had stolen the Gold, a long time ago. As Godel was carrying the chest back to the Palace, a dangerous King captured her and locked her up in a golden cave, guarded by a golden dragon, so he could steal the hoard.

The following day Terra and Mars argued because Mars, who was both selfish and evil, wanted to take the treasure back from the King, but Terra who was a Golden hearted God, wanted to rescue Godel. Terra saw a little bit of good in Mars and persuaded him to rescue Godel. One night, while the golden dragon was sleeping, the Gods managed to rescue Godel but just as they were escaping, the golden dragon woke up and breathed golden fire onto Mars and turned him into a golden statue.

Godel and Terra let the greedy King keep the gold and built a fortress to protect themselves from all evil and named it Goldsborough, after the golden statue of Mars.